Excerpt from Agricultural Market and Price Policies in Foreign Countries Following the outbreak of war in 1939, government controls over agricultural production, trade and food consumption were generally intensified. Many of the wartime controls have since been relaxed. But government intervention in agriculture remains more widespread and far-reaching than before the war, most foreign countries employing it in connection with efforts to cope with the continuing and much more difficult balance-of-payments, particularly the dollar, problem. Increased agricultural production is widely considered one of the potentially important dollar savers, and therefore an essential part of any plan to eliminate the dollar deficit. It is the principal means whereby underdeveloped countries can increase their foreign exchange earnings, and so advance economic development programs. The need to reduce the dollar deficit and increase foreign exchange earnings has also abetted the protectionist tendencies abroad that were already vigorous before the war. As a result, agricultural policy in most countries is more actively engaged than ever before in developing agricultural production.
