Excerpt from The Money God: Or the Empire and the Papacy, a Tale of the Third Century We believe it had been difficult to have found a happier man than Furius Nomentanus Lupus at the moment we undertake to occupy ourselves with him. To judge of it, let the reader who wishes first cast with us a glance upon his splendid dwelling. By itself it formed what is called an island insula, because entirely isolated from every neighboring habitation, and situated exactly in an enclosure, towards which converged several public ways. This house had been constructed a few years before the period of our story, in the new quarter, on the side that certain upstarts had begun to seek, that is, the ancient Field of Mars which was to advance gradually and help form the Rome of our day. Why, indeed, should not the mania of building, which generally seizes upon declining nations, make use of that vast space where the political and military life of the Roman people had ceased to exercise itself, and which the emperors, already for a number of years past, voluntarily exiled from Rome, no longer filled (except at rare intervals) with the solemn manifestation of warlike pomps?
