Not illustrated. 1888-01-01 Excerpt: .work, while the new idea that the subject demands and must have, to be successful, most truthful seeing and accurate knowledge, has been still more difficult to realize and slow of growth. Its disciplinary value in the cultivation of observation and deftness of touch that the eye and hand may work easily together is alone worth all the time and money spent upon it, while its broadening effect upon life in opening new paths of expression and enjoyment reaches too far into the future to be measured. Four years ago under a new state law an endeavor was made to put this subject on a firmer basis in the Elmira schools, and against some opposition and more indifference a beginning was made. Interest in a new field had to be aroused and held, and with many teachers having no technical training, rooms crowded to overflowing and with very little money or apparatus. Do what you can was the direction given and the result showed much faithful effort. In undertaking the work at that time together with the planning and diiection of a course in writing, I had much doubt of ever being able to make it thorough, the odds against it being so great and the strain of constant travel and visiting added to the large amount of office work demanding such prolonged physical endurance. Our drawing books as then used were entirely inadequate to the advanced demands of the time, so an entire course of...
