Excerpt from Transactions and Proceedings and Report of the Royal Society of South Australia, 1886, Vol. 8 In the absence of paleontological evidence all identification of rocks based solely on their lithological features is open to a greater or less amount of doubt, but a faithfully recorded sequence of conformable strata in any one locality becomes a clue deserving consideration when examining neighbouring districts the topographical features of which suggest a relation thereto. It has been shown that the upheaval of the western side of the Wakefield basin has had the effect of folding and faulting the beds of the upper group, producing. The swells which by denudation of the softer portions now form the numerous parallel ranges extending northward. In the troughs of synclinal folds, or along the line of faults, the numerous creeks have worn deep channels, and owing to this circumstance, i.e., the water following an indicated or ready-formed system of drainage, there are very few gorges or natural sections through out the whole district. What lies beneath the quartzites of the lower group is not visible in this district,...
